The Jury from NOVEMBER/DECEMBER 2012 Volume 24, Issue 5 The Art and Science of Litigation Advocacy

s RITA HANDRICH AND DOUG KEENE have so clearly laid out in this issue, false confessions are very difficult for jurors to understand and believe. Why in the heck would someone confess to something they didn't do unless they were crazy? Sometimes they are. But most of the people who confess do so under the pressure of the interrogation, whether they are mentally ill or not. Due to the difficulty and strength of jurors' attitudes and emotional reaction to false confessions, supplemental juror questionnaires are essential to distinguish the jurors who will be able to even consider that a person could confess to something they didn't do.

From the defense standpoint, as with most criminal cases, the more black and white the thinker, the less likely they will be to even consider the defense. The ability to understand that someone could become so stressed or sleep deprived, confused or fearful, or be so impulsive that they would confess to something they didn't do depends on a person being able to put themselves in someone else's shoes. Since the research shows that most people don't believe that they would ever confess to something they didn't do, the ability to evaluate another's situation as distinct from their own is very important. The defense needs to find leadership jurors who have enough of a sense of human frailty that they will be able to look at all the variables that affect an interrogation.

Jurors will have to be able to consider the psychological ramifications of pressure, fear of the police and the conditions of the interrogation, combined with the defendant's personality and situation. Asking about experience with mental health issues and attitudes towards psychology can help to identify those jurors who most need to be challenged. A questionnaire is a particularly good way to ask about such sensitive issues which jurors might not want to talk about in open court. Keep in mind that not everyone who has had a mental illness or dealt with someone who has had a mental illness will be good for the defense. It's important to explore attitudes about the impact of mental illness and about those who are mentally ill if this is a part of your defense. But in general, jurors who "don't believe" in the influence of psychological factors are not going to be able to consider any kind of defense to false confession.

There are questions which should be asked in the questionnaire based on the specifics of the case. If the defendant is a young person with emotional problems, you would want to know if jurors have had a job where they worked with this kind of population and then in voir dire you can explore what their attitudes are about these kinds of kids. As with any experience, it's the attitude and lessons the juror draws from their experience that is important.

Attitudes towards the police and criminal justice system are always useful indicators of a juror's ability to be fair in a criminal case. False confession cases necessarily involve extensive criticism of the interrogation techniques utilized by the police, thus it is important to ask numerous questions to determine which jurors will be able to consider that the police were overzealous. Questions about jurors' experience with, connections to and support for law enforcement are essential. In general, those who are more supportive of law enforcement will have a harder time finding that interrogation techniques could produce a wrong result. Again, the juror's reaction to their experience with the police can help you to understand how they may, or may not, react to the defendant's reaction during their interrogation.

Of course, any jury questionnaire has to be tailored to the case and the Trial consultants and iurisdiction. lawyers should be aware of local and possibly national news stories that involve claims of false confessions. In persuading the judge to allow a questionnaire, cite the research which shows that there is widespread skepticism about the defense. If the case involves a horrendous crime, point out that the attitudes of jurors will be even stronger that no one who is not guilty would confess, unless they were tortured or significantly mentally ill. If the defendant is not white or has other personal characteristics which could produce prejudice in jurors, those issues should be included as well.

have to consider the voir dire conditions in your jurisdiction. The more restrictive the jurisdiction, the more questions you may want to include in the questionnaire. Under the best voir dire circumstances, questionnaires help to identify issues that will be fruitful for follow-up questioning during jury selection. One of the benefits of having a questionnaire is that it gives jurors a chance to think about some of their experiences and attitudes without the pressure of public testimony and we get fuller answers during jury selection. Sometimes referring to their anxiety in jury selection can help them to begin to understand the defendant's anxiety in being questioned by the police.

Following are some of the questions that will be useful in a juror questionnaire in a case involving false confessions. Some are general, some are more casespecific, depending on the facts. Many of these same questions would be useful in a civil wrongful imprisonment case.

Finally as with all questionnaires, you
